Yes we went for a hike this morning. No we are not showing you the scenery although it was impressive. We detect you are wearying of red rocks.

We also suspect you are tired of seeing pictures of us. We offer the following only to illustrate once again that older does not equal wiser:

23° temp + 10mph wind = 12° wind chill.

This is the Visitor Center in the northeast section of Canyonlands, which is called Island in the Sky. There is a reason it's called that. There is a reason for everything.

This alien mushroom was along the trail we took. Alien mushrooms apparently have navels.

On the way back to our room we saw this cloud, from which that mushroom very likely could have dropped.

For the record, those rocks are gray.

It was really cold. We had picnic lunch in our room. (Go ahead, challenge our manhood, Sheila won't mind). Our room is here.

We went for a couple of car hikes, too. You can't see pictures of them because they are full of red rocks, both alongside the road and in the road. One of the car hikes started from Potash Road. On the way we saw the potash plant.

There were numerous climbers on the cliffs along Potash Road. They climb with ropes and lots of metal thingies that they play with first. Another guy was climbing upside down across the ceiling of a shallow cave. We called him Spiderman. We are creative.

We saw Huck Finn. And, unlike in the book, his mom and dad.

Interestingly, almost no one has asked about the car. This could be passive support for Murray. This could be total apathy. But we'll give you four clues anyway.

1. The company has a Latin name.
2. It is owned by Chinese.
3. It manufactures in Belgium.
4. Above is an actual photo.

I know, we made it way too easy.

Tonight we dined at Bucks: Vegetarian Enchilada (crepe filled with eggplant, zucchini, apple and pumpkin seeds), and Southwest Cilantro Pasta. For dessert – say it with us – Flourless Chocolate Terrine.
