Greetings from Sundance.

We have a collection of movies with Indian actors. Not Bollywood – more like Arapahollywood. (Patience, please, while I weave this back together.) Several years ago we watched a movie called Christmas in the Clouds (silly but entertaining) because it featured Indian actors Sheila Tousey and Graham Greene. The movie was filmed entirely at Sundance Resort (yes, Robert Redford) and we decided we had to go there someday. Today is someday.

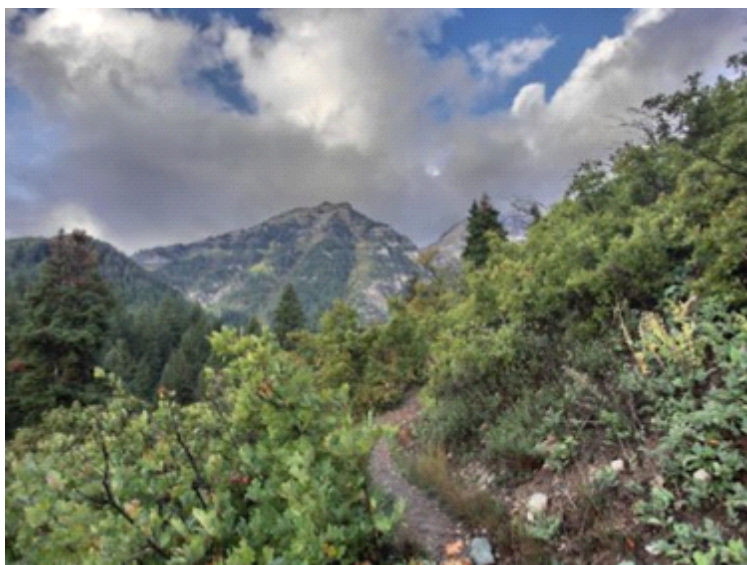

Our cabin sits here in the Wasatch Range among bigtooth maple, gambel oak, quaking aspen and a mixture of mountain conifers. It has a noisy creek behind it and a little deck for drinking coffee.

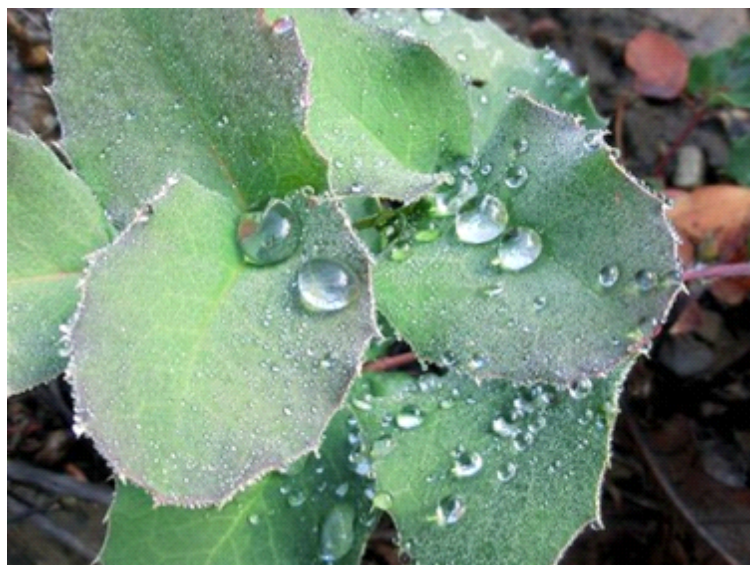

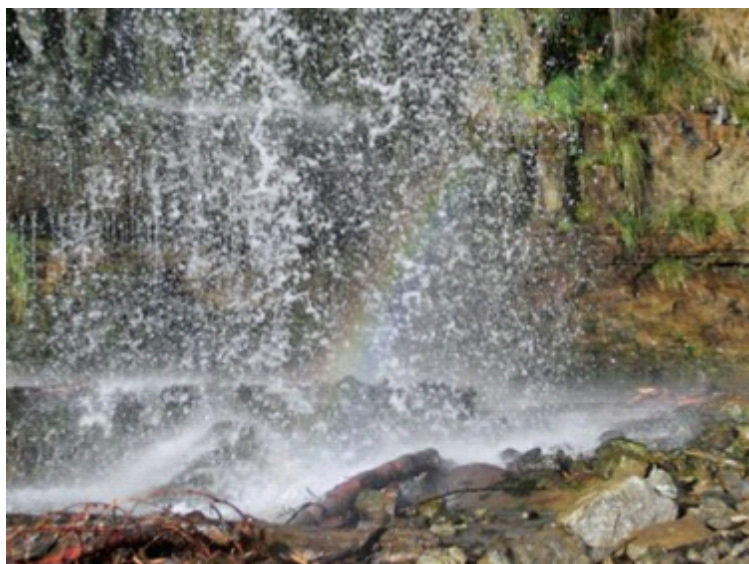

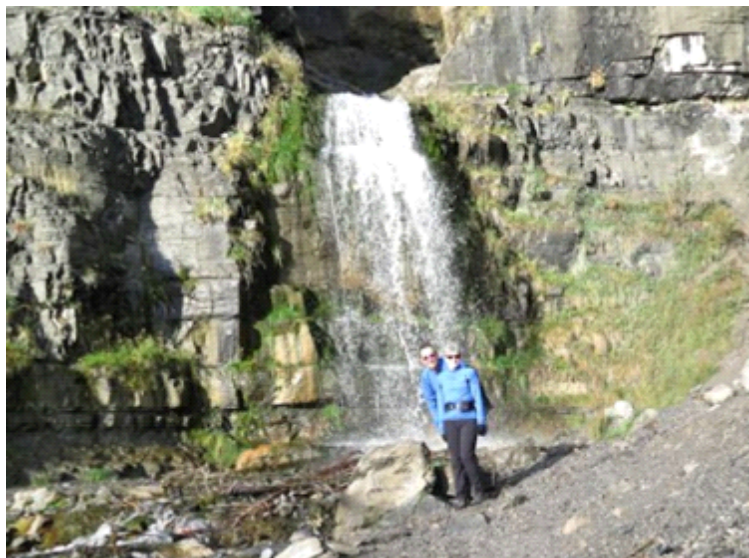

The chairs are hard, both on the deck and in the rooms, in order to get you out and paying for extra activities like golf, or tennis, or yoga, or “bringing your mind, body and spirit into perfect balance in a softly-lit, natural wood spa”.

As intended, we were propelled out of our cabin by the chairs, but avoided the money traps by using one of the hiking trails accessible to guests. We headed for Stewart Falls which cascades down from some melting icepack. Everything around us was soaking wet from last night's rain and soon we were too, at least from the ankles down. Luckily the sun was making its chance appearance for the day, playing peek-a-boo behind low lying clouds.

We got back in time for the next round of rain and lunch from the deli. We had chicken with chipotle aioli on ciabatta on hard chairs. The chicken was on the ciabatta, we were on the chairs.
